9 Jet Training

You don't need to be a pilot to be an astronaut anymore. However, all astronauts must train in jets. Trainees fly the T-38 Talon, a jet designed for training astronauts. If an astronaut's job does not require them to fly a spaceship, they sit in the back seat while a pilot sits in front.

Canadian astronaut Dr. Leroy Sider-Gibbons in a T-38.

Flying teaches astronauts to think quickly. Astronauts learn navigation, radio communication and much more. Flying a jet also pushes their bodies to their limits. Trainees experience 9 forces of many times Earth's gravity, just like they'll experience during launch. This part of their training is called spaceflight readiness.

PREPARING TO VISIT THE ISS

10 Vomit Comet

Astronauts feel weightless in space, but not because there's no gravity (there is). Actually, they are falling with the spacecraft in an orbit around the Earth. In orbit, the "floor" of the spacecraft isn't pushing up on their bodies, so they float.

Astronaut candidates (ASCANs) float in microgravity aboard a KC-135 aircraft during parabolic flight.

This KC-135A has just started flying a "parabolic arc." During this time, occupants aboard the aircraft would experience microgravity and feel weightless!

The plane is nicknamed the "vomit comet" because around one in three passengers becomes ill from the experience.

Can you feel weightlessness without going to space? Yes! A plane can be flown so that the floor doesn't push up on you. The plane rises and falls in a path called a parabolic arc. What does this arc look like? Imagine a dolphin jumping out of the water. From the time it leaves the water to the time it reenters, the dolphin feels weightlessness, too!
